

 One of the Federal organs of the Republican party in this city—the Standard—has of late harped much upon our borrowing money from the United States Bank. 'Tis true that we did borrow, but we have promptly met our engagements, and under such circumstances the public have nothing to do with our private affairs. How is it with the editor of the Standard? He openly and publicly declared to different persons, that he would not support ANDREW JACKSON unless the General Committee “shelled out” the cash for his so doing. He will not tell us the amount at which he was bought over, but we happen to know something of the price which the money changers paid for him. Will he be kind enough to inform the public how large a discount he obtained from a certain Bank in Albany, and at whose solicitation it was granted? Will he also please tell us whether the note was paid when due—whether it was not sent to be protested through mistake, but on a certain individual explaining “the fair business transaction,” renewed? This is an interesting subject for the editor of the organ, and he will perceive that we understand it perfectly.

While explaining, he may as well point out the difference between our borrowing money in Philadelphia and paying it when due, and his borrowing in Albany and not paying. It will be an easy matter to prove, that because we paid we were bribed, while his not paying or not even troubling himself about his note, is evidence of his honesty! We wish he would pay us the bet he made upon Mr. Adams' election with Mr. Bennet, which has been regularly assigned to us.
